The learner is, from first to last, exercised in actually speaking the language, as well as in writing it and committing to memory its words. He is not given the theory of the language merely. Everything taught he is enabled to use readily and correctly in conversation; and this from the necessary result of the method pursued. The tongue and the ear are given their full share of exercise, so that nothing is imparted to the understanding which is not entirely available in its practical use. Possessed of these characteristics, we give the method our entire commendation. Its adaptation to the wants of the learner is too obvious to need much comment, did our limits admit; and those who become acquainted with its practical workings will be still more sensible of its value. Men have been accustomed...
