Chase: Delivered at the Republican Mass Meeting in Cincinnati, August 21, 1855; Together With Extracts From His Speeches in the Senate on Kindred Subjects Mr. Chairman and Fellow Citizens: More than thirty years have passed away since I, then a mere boy, became a dweller in this city. Few of those whom I now see before me have been here so long: to none of you, I am sure, is the prosperity of this beautiful city, or the advancement, in all respects, of her noble institutions, more dear. A boy citizen of the city before most of you were born, I have witnessed her progress with mingled pride, joy and gratitude; and in my measure and sphere have diligently sought, and shall always seek, to promote her welfare. Here in Cincinnati are all my interests centered. If she prospers, I partake in her prosperity. If she suffers, I, as well as the rest of you, must share the reverse. Bound thus to you by common interests, and common hopes, and common affections, I stand before you to night in a position which, not many months since, I little dreamed of occupying: as the nominee of a great and powerful party for a high and responsible position - not one, it is true, invested with any control over Legislative action, nor indeed with any considerable power of any kind; but high and respectable nevertheless, because he who tills it must be taken to represent, in the great leading principles which he avows, the opinions of the people by whom he is elected. You are aware, fellow citizens, that it has been...
